

2/1/12

Grignard

At low temperatures, only those reactions with lower activation barriers tend to predominate, even if they result in products that may not be as favorable thermodynamically. When a large, bulky base is used to perform eliminations, a less favorable product can be obtained due to the difficulty of that hindered base in removing a more sterically-hindered hydrogen.

Wittig

